Supporting Separated Parents

Divorce, separation or family breakdown can be difficult and stressful for everyone involved.

Family Dispute Resolution (FDR) is a mediation process that helps couples to sort out problems and disagreements caused by their separation or divorce.

Many separated or separating couples who access FDR are able to come to agreement on issues such as property, money and most importantly, the children, without the need to go to court.

Frequently asked questions

Is FDR legal advice?

No, we encourage our clients to seek independent legal advice. While we work in the context of the Family Law Act, our practitioners are not working as lawyers.

Is FDR counselling?

No, however we can refer you to one of our counsellors to address issues such as coping with stress and anxiety caused by the separation. We also offer counselling for children to help them adjust to changes within the family structure.

Is FDR Court?

No, we do not impose legal outcomes on people. Our aim is to help you negotiate agreements together, minimise conflict and look after the needs of the children. FDR is designed to help you avoid having to ask a court to make decisions about your children and your money.

What happens during FDR?

A qualified practitioner guides parents through discussions about sharing decision-making, particularly in regard to their child/children's welfare, so that parents can resolve conflict and come to mutual agreements.

FDR practitioners are impartial and will not take sides. A qualified practitioner can help you to explore family issues in an objective and positive way.

Separated parents who are having difficulty coming to an agreement on parenting and financial arrangements after separation can access our FDR service.

More information about FDR

FDR practitioners cannot provide legal advice, but our staff are qualified under the Family Law Act 1975 to provide family dispute resolution services; and issue a Section 60I certificate (when appropriate).

An FDR practitioner ensures all parties have a say, all points of view are heard and mutual agreement is reached. Before FDR can commence, an assessment will be made to see whether FDR is suitable for your situation.

Your privacy is important to us and we will not disclose your personal information without your express permission. Evidence of what is said during FDR is not admissible in court.
